Gen. Mat. Ransom had a very serious difficulty a few days ago, which came near being fatal, with one of the freedmen in his employ. He had occasion to reprimand him for the slothful manner in which he did his work; but the freedman threw himself on his dignity, and doubted the capacity of the General to judge his work, and, with oaths and insolence, his conduct was such that the General called upon his father, who is quite an aged man, to go to the house for his pistol. The Gensecond barrel did not explode. The negro struck the General, which disabled his left arm. He then fired a second time without effect.
